

1. I'm in the process of getting to know a new friend. We've met over the Internet, and haven't had the chance to see each other yet despite living in the same city. Modern stuffed schedules, what can I say.

Nevertheless, we seem to have a lot in common and I'm excited about the journey that waits ahead. We write each other a lot, in such volumes, actually, it might be considered to be letters from Victorian times. I'm not complaining, obviously. In each sentence we find out something new about each other and our world expands, new common ground is created. It's a nice feeling.

2. It's kind of a frustrating mistake to make, considering it takes a mere common sense not to let the snow cat in the warm house and let it melt. Not to say the North Wind's warned Elsie as well. However, I don't think she has to carry the weight of the guilt through her whole life, when something like that has already happened. So, my answer is yes, she can be forgiven.

I do think Elsie forgave herself at some point, because otherwise she wouldn't be able to look at the Snow Cat Pond without feeling guilty and sad. But at the end of the story she seemed to like spending time at the Pond.

I think the story wouldn't be that sad without the Snow Cat melting, but it still would be interesting, especially for a child. The story would be about a woman becoming friends with the wild Snow Cat, and the moral would be that pets are no less friends than people.

3. I would read this story to my child, because, despite it being sad, it's quite an interesting way of telling them why you can't bring wild animals inside and keep them like you would a dog or a cat.
4. The cartoon is beautiful. The characters, especially the playful snow cat, move smoothly, and the soft fair colors create a pleasant feeling. The music is lovely too — it sounds gentle – or considerably dramatic at the right moments – and helps express the emotions of Elsie. Together, the animation and music create a cozy atmosphere that perfectly reflects the fairy tale the grandma tells the girl.
5. I think the first option is fitting for the moral of the story. Elsie should have looked out for the cat's well-being. She shouldn't have let it inside just to spend a little more time together or because she was too tired to give it a thought. Because in the end the cat was harmed because of her actions, because she didn't think how her decisions may affect the animal. That's why it's important to evaluate your actions carefully when it comes to your friends' well-being.
