

The thing is I find it hard to think about what would I change in the past if an opportunity presented itself. Ever since I read about the butterfly effect, I imagine any unprompted minor action in the past would alternate our timeline in a way no one can really predict. Would it really save all the innocent people if someone went back in time and caught a serial killer or would it inspire other bad — if not worse — people to take his place and continue this killer's doings? Would it speed up our progress if someone provided excessive technological knowledge we have now to medieval people? Or would their unprepared minds cause them to fear technologies and postpone progress as much as possible?

It's hard to tell.

That's why if I ever go back in time, I wouldn't be an active participant, but a mere observer.

I would choose to visit the fateful night of February 2, 1959, at the Dyatlov Pass in the Ural Mountains of Russia. There a mysterious incident took place, in which nine experienced hikers lost their lives under unknown circumstances.

My desire to witness this event firsthand stems from a deep curiosity about the unknown and a longing to uncover the truth behind one of the most enigmatic tragedies in outdoor exploration.

The group, led by Igor Dyatlov, was composed of skilled mountaineers, which I would observe from a distance. I would take note of their preparations, the equipment they carried, and their discussions about the journey, hoping to gain insight into the dynamics of the group.

On that fateful night, I would remain vigilant, watching the events unfolding. I would seek to understand the sudden panic that led the hikers to flee their tents in the harsh, freezing conditions. Were they truly fleeing from some unseen threat, or was it a case of collective hysteria?

I would document everything, hoping to bring clarity to the mystery that has sparked countless theories—from avalanches and infrasound to secret military tests and supernatural encounters.

By witnessing the events, I could contribute to the understanding of this haunting mystery without risking any unintended consequences that could alter the course of history. But then maybe when I get back to my time, I will share my knowledge with the world to put this mystery to peace.
